A Big Decision

“What?” asks uneasily my dad loud, but the identical question can read in the eyes of all my relatives.

We are sitting in my parent house at the dinner table with my future parents-in-law. Each room, each corner in the house is known by heart. Almost thirty years I have spent there. I can guide with closed eyes around it. Each room has its own small and memory, but this one is the coziest. My dad did it a couple of years ago. He always wants to have a fireplace at the home, and I can understand why. A fireplace is a sign not only from his childhood but also from mine, and it becomes the heart of the house. Today, in this room, at the huge solid wood dinner table with dishes that are known from childhood, chatting about everything and nothing at the same time, my fiancé and I have to say a big, changing our life news. It is a third time as I see my fiancé’s parents so I really do not know their reaction on the news.

“What? When? Why? How?” says everybody at the same time, and I can see how astonished they are.

“Are you pregnant?” another silly question flew out from my dad’s mouth. One time, in my early twenties I was pregnant and hide it from them too long scared by their reaction. Now he surprises us by his shrewdness.

“Noooo...”, we answer together in one voice.

“We are moving to Canada in six months.” says my fiancé in his best calm voice.

“But you are not married...”

“We will marry in one month.”

“What about Oleg?”

“I will adopt him.”

At that moment, a bouquet of all possible emotions starting from the blessing for marriage and total fear about our moving is in our parent’s eyes. Even some tears in the mom’s eyes. I think if my dad would smoke, he would take not one cigarette after such news. It seems that all ancestors from the photos on the walls become alive and have the same questions and feelings.

“But how?” asks again my dad.

“I got an invitation for work in Canada,” answers my fiancé. “The company will do all documents and pay all expenses. You do not need to worry. Everything will be good. Must be.”

“But you are not married...” almost whispers my dad.

He is that kind of father who admires own children and puts children in the first place in life. And now, after the news which is the cold shower for him, he wants to protect my son and me from any kind of possible issues. His eyes become narrow, and some concern about my future and future of his only one grandchild settles in his mind.

“Do not worry, daddy. We will marry this month,” I try to soothe him. “And after we will do all papers for adoption. We know what we are doing.”

It looks like a couple of new wrinkles just appear on the faces of our parents. There is too much news for them in one day. Just yesterday, we were dating, and tomorrow we will be not only married but also moving far away from them.

“What about the wedding? Realities? You both know what they would say about you two and us if no wedding will be.”

“We do not have time and money for the wedding, I hope they will survive without our wedding.”

“And I need to fly to Canada next week for meeting with my manager and human resource for completion all needed documents for the Canadian embassy,” adds my fiancé.

“So...no wedding at all? Even for us?” in a very sensitive voice asks my future father-in-law.

“Of course not...We will arrange some small restaurant at the end of the month to celebrate it.

When I will return from Canada with all documents,” says my fiancé and makes parents a little bit happier.

“I will go first to Canada to settle out everything, and they will come to me in a couple of months. There are a lot of steps and things that must be done at first, and I do not want to put all this pressure on them.”

I can see the pride of a son on the face of his parents. They are proud because he is the first with a university degree in their family and made himself without any help. Because of such harsh and hard way up, he starts to go gray too early, in his twenties. It is the price of his today success.

“No,” says strictly and wisely my dad. “You will be a family at that moment, and you have to go all together. Such difficulties make a family only stronger and united.”

“It is so far away... That Canada...” sighed with sorrow says my fiancé’s father. “I know, I feel you would not come to see us often...”

Unfortunately, he is right. We already know, because of the distance and prices for ticket we could not afford the first couple of years to come home to our parents. But how can we say this to them?

“Skype!!! We will talk to you via Skype! We still plenty of time to teach you how to use Skype. So, we can not only talk but also see each other any time whenever you want.”

That day, we were sitting for a long time, maybe till midnight. We were discussing all things: wedding, moving, adoption, and the worse thing-how our parents would miss us. From that moment a lot of things changed. The parent’s house walls become even dearer than was. Mom’s cooking starts tasting even tastier. Each free day I try to spend with my parents in a manner to cover what I would miss when will move out. I force my fiancé to do the same with his parents.
